* Excerpt of pertinent information

: ... He (Dimitrescu) then went into a long explanation of his relations with the Iron Guard and other Rumanian elements here in Madrid, interspersing his comments from time to time with references to General RADESCU, saying that he had been in correspondence with the General, and he left me with the impression that the General was even prepared to consider him, Dimitrescu, as the representative in Spain of the Rumanian National Committee. Dimitrescu tried to make out that the Iron Guardists and others with whom he has associated here are the real fighters and active Rumanians and that ANTONIAD was just a mere Commercial Attache without any particular influence. . . . After he had stopped talking, I (Paul T. Culbertson) explained to him that Washington had given some degree of recognition to the work of the Rumanian National Committee under General Radescu; that the representative here who had been designated by the Committee was Antoniad and, therefore, such dealings as the Embassy might have would have to be through those channels and that furthermore we had no intention of involving ourselves in controversies between various elements of the exiled Rumanians.
